A Vietnamese Grammar

Vietnamese is an analytic language, meaning it conveys relationship between words primarily through "helper words" as opposed to inflection. The basic word order is subject-verb-object, but sentences may be restructured so as to be topic-prominent. Vietnamese is otherwise largely head-initial, has a noun classifier system, is pro-drop, wh-in-situ, and allows verb serialization.

Vietnamese grammar - Wikipedia

Vietnamese, like many languages in Southeast Asia and Chinese, is an analytic (or isolating) language. As such its grammar highly relies on word order and sentence structure rather than morphology (word changes through inflection). While most European languages would use morphology to express tense Vietnamese uses grammatical particles or syntactic constructions.

Learn Vietnamese - Grammar - 101 Languages

The grammar in the Vietnamese language is heavily reliant upon the word order and sentence structure in order to convey the proper meaning. In fact, this is important than having word changes through the inflection of tone used, or morphology. Many languages use morphology to determine and express a tense, but that is not the case with Vietnamese.

Vietnamese is similar to English in the general sentence structure, which is: Subject + Verb (+ Object) + Adverbs. It was mentioned here. There is no change to words' form, i.e., no inflection; use additional words to express the added meaning instead. Nouns when used to refer to specific objects require the use of an appropriate measure word.
