Animals have preserved their tails because they still have a use for them. However, all animals use their tails for non-uniform purposes, although they mostly have to deal with balancing, defense and navigation. Only a few domesticated animals use tails to express emotions and communicate. Here are some ways in which animals use their tails:

Why Do Animals Have Tails? » Science ABC

But experts caution against humans turning to their pooches for some salivary support in times of need, because while doggy dribble is great for healing their own open wounds, they also contain a bevy of bacteria that could be harmful for us two-legged types. Dogs' mouths commonly contain bacteria called pasteurella and bartonella, which can cause infection to humans whose gashes are exposed ...
